New Homes Cropping Up in Cities

Today in conventional wisdom-busting news, we learn that grimy old cities are attracting more residential construction than the bright suburban frontier. Urban redevelopment is outpacing fringe sprawl by a solid margin, according to a new U.S. environment Protection Agency study of the nation's 50 largest metro areas.

What's more, the study finds, it's not that regional policies are herding people back into urban neighborhoods. Personal preference seems to be driving much of the change. Turns out more people are deciding they want to live near walkable neighborhoods, transit lines, and other urban amenities.

Fenn Academy Summer Camp

To introduce local high school students to college and career opportunities in engineering, the Fenn Academy in Cleveland State University's Fenn College of Engineering is hosting the Pathways to engineering Summer Camp. As part of this year's Clean and Renewable Energy theme, students will experience hands-on engineering activities, learn how to prepare for college engineering programs and be exposed to potential engineering career options.

Presentations and hands-on activities in the areas engineering design, wind energy, solar energy, and fuel cell technology will be conducted.
